

The Habitat in Roman Dacia (towns, pagi, villages, vici militares) (Summary)

The publications known so far ascertain that in order to establish the territory of a town several elements must be considered: the natural borders, the literary sources, ancient or modern maps, inscriptions, archaeological investigations (especially the tegulae), the pre-Roman or medieval situation. The territory of a town was not continuous, because it did not include the mining districts, the territories of the legions, the military vici or the canabae.

The present study is a synthesis of the existing theories upon the organization of the habitat in Roman Dacia, especially of the urban territories. We believe the entire economical life of the province was organized according to and within these territorial structures. Clarifying this matter might offer more information about the commercial exchanges inside the province or even about how production was organized.
