Abstract: The author made some remarks about the traces indicating economical life in the legionary site at Bersobis. Unfortunately, our knowledge is affected by the absence of the large archaeological excavations. Legio IIII Flavia Felix has built the timber fortress probably in 102 p. Chr., after the first war against the Dacians. Until 119, when the legion left the camp, the soldiers reconstructed in stone some important buildings like the principia. For the time being estimations of the used materials (timber, stone, tiles) and work would be premature. Concerning the workshops there are signs for the production of bronze statuettes, glass and iron. Certainly in this great military site other typical activities are implied, waiting for the archaeological research.*
